

A Plus media alert

Dear editors and reporters:

Director of Audit interview

The September issue of A Plus is out now, featuring an exclusive interview with David Sun about his first year of looking at the city's books, an analysis of the global crackdown on tax avoidance and its impact on Hong Kong, and other stories

(HONG KONG, 12 September 2013) – Former EY chairman David Sun's appointment last year as Hong Kong's first Audit Commission chief from outside the civil service caused controversy. One year on, he tells A Plus that he has been getting on with his staff very effectively and enjoys his role immensely as the skill set required is very similar to that at an auditing firm. He is also bringing innovation to the commission's operation. See more from the September cover feature of the magazine.

Amid G20 deliberation on new rules to reshape international company tax practices, A Plus finds that Hong Kong may benefit. Multinationals growing wary of traditional tax havens may switch to Hong Kong where taxes might be a little higher but the structure is more acceptable internationally due to its economic substance.

Hong Kong accountants are success ingredients not only in business, but also in society at large. Three Institute members were included in the Honours List this year for their various roles: Institute president Susanna Chiu, outgoing commissioner of inland revenue Chu Yam-yuen, and Charles Chow who has made invaluable contributions to Cantonese opera development.

One of Hong Kong's hottest venues, AsiaWorld-Expo, is seeing its business thrive as it has been holding more and more popular exhibitions and concerts, including those of Lady Gaga and Linkin Park. The company CFO, Karen Cheung, an Institute member, talks about how she is applying her financial expertise to help the growth.

The accounting profession is much broader than only covering audit and tax as Institute members are increasingly turning to different specialized fields to meet complex business demands. These specializations include: corporate finance, corporate governance, forensic accounting, information technology, management accounting, restructuring and insolvency, and risk management.
